

Today, not being able to write well is holding too many children back. More than a quarter of our children are leaving primary school not up to the expected standard, unable to write well enough to succeed in secondary school and beyond. That's a huge barrier to learning, not just in English lessons, but across the whole curriculum.

Bridget Phillipson, The Secretary of State for Education

Webinar 1

After much anticipation The Department for Education has published its new writing Framework, which provides practical advice for teachers and leaders to help make sure pupils from reception through to year 6 build strong foundations in language, spelling, and handwriting. The framework has been co-created with input from a range of sector experts, including academics, leading practitioners, writing programme providers, the EEF, Ofsted, and other stakeholders.

Our webinar begins a short programme of online information sharing sessions which will take you through the report section by section and provide key messages and implications for schools.
